A Big Little Enterprise.

The little town of Swansea, Lexington county, has a big enterprise whose fame has gone abroad. Among other things the Swansea Crate and Veneer Company makes Irish potato barrels and vegetable crates. One order has been received from Charleston for 10,000 potato barrels, with an option on 20,000. The little company now has orders for 75 car loads of barrels and declines to accept further orders for this season. Its output is shipped as far away as New York, Philadelphia and Grand Rapids.

About 50 men and 35 women are given employment, most of whom would probably have to go elsewhere to secure work were this factory not located in Swansea. Furthermore, it converts hitherto useless woods, such as sweet gum and black gum, into very useful products. Besides giving employment to nearly a score of men and women, it provides a market for those who have this wood growing in the swamps upon their farms.

The point of the story is this: Why could not Edgefield have such an enterprise and also other similar small enterprises? We believe sufficient local capital could be provided. We have the men and women who need such employment and we also have a world of wood of various kinds scattered over the county. The saw mills and lumber plants are providing a market for our pine timber during this "rainy day" but thus far we have practically no market for black gum, sweet gum and other similar wood.

We'll Never Grow Old.

In that beautiful city of wonder and light,

Where enchantingly spiritual all things are made bright,

There rest, peace and joy are ours,

We are told;

And in that beautiful city we never grow old.

In that beautiful city our loved ones we'll greet,

And our communion with each will be wonderfully sweet;

No sneer or derision or words that are cold,

For in that beautiful city love never grows old.

Through that beautiful city flows the river of life,

In its refreshing clearness there's no reflection of strife;

The sands of its shores are as silver and gold,

And when we drink of its waters we never grow old.

In that beautiful city, its streets are so broad,

There's room for all without social discord;

And look where you may, some wonder you behold,

For in that beautiful city things never grow old.

The fountain of youth flows eternally there,

And in its rich virtue we'll have our full share;

The mystery of eternity to us will unfold,

For in that beautiful city we never grow old.

Weevil Poisoning Again.

Clemson College, April 24.—Every day numerous inquiries are received at Clemson College in regard to one or other of the numerous devices for attaching to plows for applying liquid poison, for brushing the cotton to knock the weevil from the plants, for attracting weevils to light, etc., etc. The man with new devices for boll weevil control has been ever-present in the wake of the weevil during the last twenty years. Many of these devices represent patriotic and conscientious effort, while in some cases the motive is purely selfish.

In many cases at least the man who gets up the device has no knowledge whatever of the history of boll weevil control and is not aware that his plans have been tried and tested by Federal and State experts and representative farmers for a number of years and found unsatisfactory. He fails to realize that the people of other states are just as intelligent and clever as he is and that many of his ideas have been thrashed to a frazzle long before they occurred to him.

In making recommendations or statements regarding such matters we are guided by the number of pounds of seed cotton that any given device has been able to add profitably to the cotton crop; we recognize only the results of carefully conducted tests and we can not base our recommendations on guess work, says Prof. A. F. Conradi, Entomologist; and in answer to the numerous inquiries we repeat that wherever one has decided to poison we recommend the use of calcium arsenate as a dust, with properly constructed machines, according to a proper schedule.

This recommendation is based on the fact that we have no evidence where profitable results were secured in carefully conducted tests by other than the dusting method. We do say that where one dusts he will secure profitable results, because not by any means did all farmers that dusted secure profitable results in 1921, but in carefully conducted tests by experts under the supervision of Federal and State officials, wherever profit was secured it was secured by the dusting machine method.

We have prepared an office letter entitled "Poisoning in 1922" to accompany Circular 162 of the Federal Government, and these are available for distribution by the Extension Service, Clemson College, S. C.
